Hawaii, Alaska And US Territories Team Up Against The Jones Act

(AP) Lawmakers from Hawaii, Alaska, Puerto Rico and Guam are teaming up to pressure the U.S. government for relief from a maritime law passed in the 1920s. The Jones Act was designed to protect the domestic shipping industry. It states that only ships made in the U.S. and flying the country's flags can deliver goods between U.S. ports. That means that a cargo ship filled with goods from China can only make one stop in the U.S. at a time. It can't stop in Hawaii to exchange goods before heading to Los Angeles.

Hawaii state Senator Sam Slom says the law punishes the people of Alaska, Puerto Rico, Guam and Hawaii with high costs of living. Slom is part of a bipartisan group of Hawaii lawmakers pushing Congress to reconsider the Jones Act or to consider a waiver for non-contiguous states and territories. The Puerto Rico Senate passed a resolution calling for an investigation of the economic impact of the Jones Act. Puerto Rico Senator Rossana Lopez Leon says, "Studies by the World Economic Forum and Federal Reserve Bank in New York have concluded that the Jones Act hinders economic development in the commonwealth."

The American Maritime Partnership, a coalition that represents vessel owners and operators, unions, equipment yards and vendors, says the Jones Act is critical for economic and security reasons. It says the domestic maritime industry is responsible for nearly 500,000 jobs and more than $100 billion in annual economic output.

Celebrity Corner

Pat Toscano, PAIMA Regional Director and Michelle St.Cyr, PAIMA Executive Director

What a treat! Pat Toscano is a legend here at PAIMA and in our industry. While he was in South Florida, he took the time to share a few lessons on the history of PAIMA and then we had a great conversation about PAIMA's future. Of course, those who know him well will tell you that there were plenty of jokes too! Thank you, Pat! Who am I visiting next? PAIMA Members - if you are in South Florida, come by the office or let's meet for lunch so you can be featured in our Celebrity Corner!
